A fake review will appear to have been written by a genuine customer but, unlike real reviews, they are paid for by the manufacturer or trader to boost ratings and rankings on sellers' websites which in turn boosts sales. In some cases companies give away goods or refund purchases in return for glowing reviews. But these practices are illegal under consumer protection law.

The CMA's investigations found businesses, agencies and individuals offering to buy or write fake reviews for cash on both online platforms, although the CMA did not believe Facebook and eBay were intentionally allowing this to happen.

Which? found tens of thousands of five-star 'unverified' reviews on Amazon during their latest investigation in April this year. An unverified review is one posted by someone who did not purchase the item. Thousands of unverified reviews were posted on the same day and for the same products - typically tech devices, such as headphones, dash cams, fitness trackers and phone chargers with unknown brand names.

'There is a serious trust issue here and it discredits the selling platform where the reviews appear,' says French. 'The heaviest detriment falls on those consumers who can least afford it. Those people looking for a bargain

, who cannot afford the big-name brands, stand to lose out.'

Amazon says it invests significant resources into protecting the integrity of its reviews, using teams of investigators and technology to detect and prevent inauthentic posts. It says it has clear rules for reviewers and sellers, and will 'suspend, ban and take legal action on those who violate policies'
